nor suggested that the suggestion was unique and in many respects good, for the property mentioned would constitute a nifty little asset for any state. He intimates, however, that there is one thing in the way, namely, the absence of funds. The governor, of course, did not take the proposition seriously.

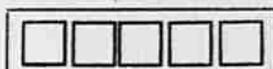

Perhaps, though, the huge figure that would be required for the purchase, something like $30,000,000, is the greatest barrier in the way. In seriousness, the governor declared that he would like to see Texas own a railroad traversing its entire extent, so as to show the road owning corporations that a lower rate may be charged and money still be made.

"Two things Texas needs," he said; "a good line of railroad and satisfactory waterways, and of these two the latter is the greater."

"What do you know of the statements made by prominent railroad officials that no more extensions will be constructed or new lines planned until the International and Great Northern receivership law is repealed?" the governor was asked.

The reply was emphatic: "That is the same bluff they tried to run when the stock and bond law was passed. They said the same thing when the railroad commission was created. And this law out they will go ahead and deal honestly with the people, and road building will continue. The International and Great Northern bill, which is but an amendment to the stock and bond law, merely includes labor, material and personal injury claims in the expense account. It is founded on morality."
